Rouse's expression was almost comic in its bewilderment. In all his lengthy experience of convict prisons he had never yet known a man to refuse his liberty. "But look here, Marley, he explained, "you don't seem to understand that you've got to go. You're the best shepherd we ever had. But the law says that you've got to leave Moorlands, and the law has got to be obeyed." Marley got up and followed obediently down the corridor to the door of the gov-clock. "I'm too late," he said to himself, ernor's office. Grim old Colonel Peyton sadly. "The old man's been here a matat sight of Marley.

he said. "I'm a son of Reuben Marley." The governor started slightly.

"I had no idea that Marley had a son," he said. "He told me only this morning that he had no relatives."

"Very likely, sir. You see, sir, I went to Canada when I was still a lad. > An expression of alarm crossed John Marley's face. "Then I must be after him at once, sir.

Could you tell me when the next train leaves?" "I am sofry to say there is not one before 5," replied the colonel.

Marley's look of dismay made Col. Peyton feel genuinely sorry for him. "I am almost as anxious as yourself that no harm shall come to your father," he said. "If you care to take my car, you can be in Plymouth in an hour." He cut short Marley's thanks by ringing the bell and ordering the car, and within less than five *minutes the old convict's son was being whirled rapidly in the direction of the sea.

His chauffeur dropped his passenger by the tram terminus, opposite the Royal Theater, and John Marley stood staring round him helplessly. Plymouth is a big place, and he had not the faintest idea in which direction to look for his father. It was striking 3 as he passed Derry's
